Would George Washington have believed, back in 1773, volunteer Citizen Militias would yet, or once again, be offering armed resistance to government; no longer against the Empire of Britain but, against the government he helped establish, the Government of the United States of America?

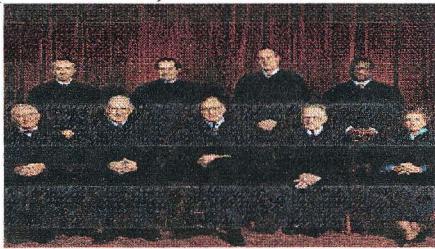

Even though provisions for citizens militias were incorporated into the Constitution:

Amendment II (1791)

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a Free State

It is doubtful General Washington envisioned citizen volunteers still 'fighting' the government 223 years later. Of course, the fact this particular provision was enacted demonstrates the healthy skepticism Washington felt about government in general.

The re-emergence of state militia organizations as a growing entity for government to recognize and reckon with began in the mid '80s. Forty-five years of a Democratically controlled Congress abridging and circumventing the Constitution, followed by political utilization of the Supreme Court, loss of civil liberties and capped with destruction of the purchasing power of the dollar and international trade policies that decimated the country's job base and economy; all impacted on the nationalism of the sleeping American public.

Using the pretext of 'exports' and law-and-order', Constitutional freedoms began evaporating, especially for middle class working white men. A large body of these men were veterans, having served in foreign wars dating back to WWII. Pride and patriotic fervor had been at the forefront of these men's personalities. They also possessed extensive military training; provided by the same government who now denied them the rights, respect and freedom they thought they had sacrificed for.

The government misjudged the passionate patriotism and love of hard fought liberties several generation now held in common. The government also made the tragic mistake of ignoring this groups' concerns in favor of social policy designed to benefit the most unproductive members of society. Corporate America further compounded the growing unrest by disdaining years of loyalty; closing industry down in favor of cheap labor and regulations provided in foreign lands.

The table was being set for a re-awakening of American Constitutional concern. When threatened with issues of freedom and survival; be they from a foreign or domestic nature, the country's long history provides for the alternative response of Patriotism as the Constitutional remedy. Importation of millions of foreign nationalities, combined with government bankrupted giveaway policies to minorities left the predominate white middle class in worsening economic condition.

The fact this generation is the first that could possibly do worse economically than their elders was having repercussions throughout middle America.

Many groups with similar interests had learned to present strength to Washington and Congress; the results of which were to deplete the National Treasury at the expense of middle America. Free education, condoms, lunches, and assorted privileges were accorded to minority and special interest organizations. What middle America lacked was organization.

That was soon to change!

The void was created. Middle class white men and women felt besieged and demonized by the government. But, being inexperienced in organizational leadership and methods, their cries for recognition went unheeded by local, state and federal government agencies and officials. Hence, enter the organization desperately sought by middle class Americans: The Militia.

Organized at first on a local level, the militia's rapidly expanded to state-level status. Ordinary folks were banding and bonding together at last. Their concerns were real, their justification written into the Constitution. Now, finally, their own class of people would be heard and able to fight back, to actively do something about their deteriorated condition.

As the gathering patriotic storm garnered momentum, the government, under President George Bush, either ignored, or because of the militia members conservatism choose to silently accept their organizing in return for anticipated votes in the election of 1992. Bush grossly miscalculated, losing the patriotic vote as well as the election. January of 1992 saw the emergence of Bill Clinton to the Presidency; a man whose values were diametrically opposed to those of the Patriotic Christian Constitutionally oriented growing militias. Patriots, conservatives and populists foresaw Clinton's ascendancy as a warning shot across the bow. The storm was about to erupt.

Patriots and militia members were almost immediately demonized by a somewhat weird assembly of ultra-liberal anti-Christian cabinet appointees. The war of words had begun. The war of violence was soon to follow.

On April 19, 1994, a Christian enclave in Waco, Texas, under the teachings of David Koresh, which had been under Clinton government siege for over 50 days and nights was violently attacked by BATF and FBI led storm troopers and tanks.

This was in retaliation for an erroneous attack previously which led to the death of four federal agents. The result this time was immediate incineration of 87 men, women, and children who resided in the enclave. The action, personally directed by Clinton's Attorney General, Janet Reno, was to American patriots Lexington revisited. The war had begun.

Militia membership swelled. Doubling and tripling in many states. What was once a silent Constitutional patriotism became a public government rebellion of words and actions overnight. Clinton, underestimating the passion, resolve and numbers involved in the expanding patriotic movement, erred again. This time enlisting the cooperation of the mostly liberal establishment media and press to paint the patriotic militia movement as right wing terrorist.

Then the anticipated return volley exploded the nations televisions into mass carnage scenes for the second time in two years with the mighty explosion of a federal government building in Oklahoma City. The impact was devastating; 167 federal employees, including children being attended to at the sites daycare center died instantly. Live television once again shook the conscience of the country's living rooms.

Almost immediately a suspect was inadvertently arrested and then held in connection to the bombing. The suspect was Timothy McVeigh, who was identified as both an former soldier who had fought for his country in the Persian Gulf War and who the government described as having links to the Michigan Militia. At once the Clinton administration ordered intense federal scrutiny placed upon all militia organizations nationwide. Once again, Clinton's obvious disdain for patriotism and it's followers backfired.

Clinton went public, castigating all patriots and militias as terrorists, temporarily placing the militia movement on the defense. However, no sooner had the ashes settled in OKC, with public opinion swaying against the militias, when the government, utilizing the FBI once again, managed to murder the ten-year old child and the wife of a government described White Supremacist named Randy Weaver at Ruby Ridge, Idaho.

The American public was beginning to awaken to this by now continuing series of skirmishes between the federal enforcement arm of the government and self-described patriots.

Now the public understood the OKC bombing was in direct retaliation for the government's murderer act at Waco. And revelations soon surfaced suggesting possible government complicity in the bombing itself. The country began to re-examine Waco, which had been passed off by the government as an extremist off-beat religious armed compound. Americans began to wonder if the government was indeed abusing the rights of its citizens through the overuse of military style vendettas.

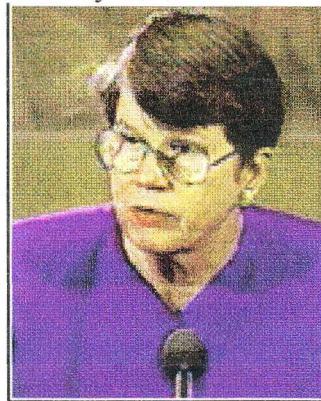

Despite the government's actions to remain on the offensive, patriotic organizational membership once again doubled. More and more Americans were willing to resist the government's label of extremist, racist and terrorist to openly describe themselves as patriots.

A growing number of citizens were beginning to realize, due to increased educational methods employed by the militias that the militias were Constitutionally bred. The increased awareness of Constitutionally wrapped militias allowed these same organizations to educate more Americans on other important Constitutional freedom and monetary issues. Fellow countrymen were beginning to accept patriots as common-bond defenders of the middle class, possibly even a group who represented their beliefs and frustrations. The American public had found a voice in the militias.

Now it was the militias turn to stand up and be counted. Did not George Washington belong to a militia? And were not the militias of that age Patriots? Reason was now dictating of militias were patriotic and patriots were the root-system of our Founding Fathers, and the Constitution permitted militias, then Constitutionally Unorganized Citizen Volunteer Patriotic Militias had to be granted their due legality and recognition by the government. And besides, they were representing the people's values and freedoms were they not?

The establishment fought back with all the power at its disposal, terming patriotic groups as racist and anti-Semitic. Those terms had always turned public opinion in the past. This time, the establishment guns were empty, as JJ Johnson, the Black leader of the Ohio Unorganized Militia and Leroy Crenshaw, a prominent Black patriotic educator spoke out. The Central Michigan Militia and New Jersey Militia roster included Jewish members, and the North Carolina Militia openly advertised for members of all sexes and races. The rhetoric of the government and the press was becoming shallow.

The educational process of linking patriots of present day to notable patriots of days gone-by was succeeding. The linkage of events and their comparison to historic rebellious events of days gone-by were also succeeding. The militias had become patriots and vice-versa.
